

HOW YOU'LL PLAY

Quizzy Fortunes

Your group is split into two teams, each made up of five players. Over the course of the game, each team sends players forward in turn to face off against the other side, with everyone getting their moment at the front. The aim is simple: work out what the room already thinks. Before the event, Premier Disco surveys a cross-section of your colleagues on a set of questions — some general knowledge, some just for you (favourite office ritual, most-used excuse for a late arrival, guesses about the company itself) — and ranks every answer by how many people gave it. Your job on the day is to think like the crowd, not like an expert.

Round One: Head-to-Head

One player from each team steps up to the buzzer. Our host reads out a survey question, and it's a straight race — first to buzz gets to answer. Give the most popular answer on the board and you win control of that question for your whole team; get it wrong, and the other player gets a free shot. If neither player lands the top answer, the next pair from each team steps forward and the question resets.

Taking Control

Once your team wins control, the host comes to each of your teammates in turn and asks for another answer from the board. Every correct answer reveals its value — worth points equal to the number of people who gave it in the survey. But you're not playing alone against the clock: your team can rack up three wrong or missing answers before you lose control entirely. If that happens, the other team gets one shot to steal everything on the board by naming any answer you haven't already found. Get it right, and they take the points instead.

Double Money

After a couple of rounds, the game moves into a Double Money round. It plays exactly the same way — buzz in, win control, work through your team, watch out for the steal — except every answer on the board is now worth twice as much. This is usually where the game is won or lost, so whichever team builds the bigger lead here goes through to the final.

The Fast Money Final

The two players from the winning team who know the room best are sent up to play Fast Money. The first plays alone, with a short window to fire off answers to five rapid-fire questions — no time to think, just react. The second player then faces the same five questions with a little more time, but can't repeat anything their teammate already said, so they need to read the board and think on their feet. Every point from both rounds is added together, and hitting the target score wins the game for the team — with extra recognition on the table for any team that finds every single top answer between them.

Throughout, the format rewards quick thinking, teamwork, and reading how your own colleagues think — not obscure trivia — which is what makes it work so well as a corporate group activity.
